From The Ground: DeLorme Tests El Salvador's Fast Food Chain's BTC Capabilities

Bitcoin has had a big week this past week. With the new all-time highs and the VanEck Spot Bitcoin ETF rejection, it is interesting to see how the market has reacted to these. VanEck had filed its ETF with the SEC and on Friday, it got back the dreaded rejection. The reason given for the rejection was that there wasn't adequate confidence that investors would be protected when investing in the fund.

After the rejection, the market was expected to react negatively. However, to much surprise, bitcoin had already finished this off and continued on its merry way. It speaks volumes to the resilience of the digital asset in times like this when a major ETF rejection failed to tank the price. Much has happened since VanEck received the rejection.

VanEck Moves Forward

After getting the rejection for the Spot Bitcoin ETF, VanEck had subsequently gotten approval for its VanEck ETP. The fund had begun trading on Tuesday on the CBOE to much anticipation. But trading in the fund was not so impressive compared to the ProShares ETP trading which had begun in October. Nevertheless, VanEck has moved forward from the rejection and so has the market.

Other funds are still filing for a Spot Bitcoin ETF though. One of those is Grayscale which is planning on turning its Bitcoin fund into a spot ETF. The VanEck rejection has shown other funds that they need to do more due diligence, meaning that there is more comprehensive research being done to back the claims in spot ETFs from other asset managers like Fidelity and Bitwise.

The market did not exactly react the way investors were anticipating. Bitcoin did not decline following the news on Friday. Instead continue to mark recovery trends in the same time period.
